

Friends Meeting House, Harrow

456 Rayners Lane, Pinner, London, HA5 5DT

National Grid Reference: TQ 12956 87924

Statement of Significance

An interwar Arts and Crafts design by Hubert Lidbetter, with furnishings from Brynmawr. The meeting house is of local architectural and historical interest, and is of overall medium significance.

Evidential value

The meeting house retains much of its original fabric and character, and is of medium evidential value.

Historical value

The meeting house was built in 1935, and belongs to the interwar suburban development of Pinner. Its primary historical interest is in the furnishings from Brynmawr and as a design by Hubert Lidbetter, a significant Quaker architect. It is of medium historical value.

Aesthetic value

The meeting house is an attractive Arts and Crafts design, retaining many external and internal features of note, including furnishings from the Brynmawr craft workshops. The domestic style fits well in the local context. The building is of high aesthetic value.

Communal value

The meeting house is used by local groups, but the use of one of the rooms is constrained. It is of medium communal value.

Part 2: The Meeting House & Burial Ground: history, contents, use, setting and designation

2.1 Historical background

Quakers met in various places in Harrow until 1934 when a plot of land in a part of Pinner then being developed for housing was acquired for £320. The 'small, neat meeting house' (Butler) was built in 1935 from designs by Hubert Lidbetter and the cost (with furnishings) was £1,744. The benches were reportedly made at Brynmawr, South Wales, a Quaker initiative of the years of the Great Depression (the Brynmawr Experiment), whereby, in the spirit of Arts and Crafts and Quaker ideals, workshops were established to give useful and creative work for the local unemployed.

In 1962 Lidbetter designed a small classroom and kitchen extension (cost £3,000). This was named The Marlborough Room, having been built with the proceeds of the sale of the Wealdstone premises of the Marlborough Mission, which had been established to help local families in the years of the Great Depression. Further minor improvements took place in 2004, including adaptation of WCs for disabled access (architects Taylor Williams Daley Partnership, London SW11).

2.2 The building and its principal fittings and fixtures

The meeting house was built in 1935 from designs by Hubert Lidbetter, who also designed a small extension to the north in 1962. It is in a domestic Arts and Crafts style, blending well with the interwar suburban setting. It is built of red brick laid in Flemish bond, with a steep tile roof and low eaves. The gable ends are rendered (that to the north largely obscured by the later addition, which is in matching materials). Raised central bays to front and rear each have a hipped roof and contain a large mullion and transom window, of nine lights each further subdivided into nine panes, the principal source of natural light for the meeting room. On either side, smaller windows are tucked under low eaves. Opening lights are metal casements.

The entrance leads into a hall area with WCs and offices to the right and a stair to an upper classroom ahead. All the doors are of oak. The main meeting room leads off to the left. This is an attractive rectangular space, lit by large windows front and back. The floor is of woodblock, and there is a horizontal boarded timber dado around the perimeter. Otherwise the walls are plastered up to the high ceiling, which is plastered under the collars. There is no ministers' platform or fixed seating. High in the wall on the south side is a shuttered opening containing a leaded casement window looking down to the meeting room from the upper classroom (figure 2). There is a second classroom and a kitchen in the 1962 addition.

2.3 Loose furnishings

The benches were made at Brynmawr, South Wales (information from local Meeting). These and a bookcase and table are contemporary with the meeting house.

2.4 Attached burial ground (if any)

Not applicable.

2.5 The meeting house in its wider setting

The meeting house lies within an area of interwar suburban housing development, such as characterises much of this part of northwest London. There is a small garden at the front, while the back of the meeting house is fairly tight up against the site boundary. Next door is a preparatory school.

2.6 Listed status

Not listed. The building is of some local architectural and historical interest, and while probably not meriting statutory listed status, would certainly merit consideration for inclusion in Harrow Council's local list.

2.7 Archaeological potential of the site

Low.
