PREFACE

This index has been compiled on the same lines as the previous General Index (Volumes 39-60). There are, however, two major changes. The presence of illustrations is no longer noted, since it is normal for articles to include illustrations where appropriate and it seemed unnecessary to indicate the fact. An exception is the section of reprinted Extracts from the Bulletins which occurs in Volumes 65-70 and, in order to alert readers, not only to the absence of illustrations, but also to the summary nature of these items, the page references are followed by (B).

The following notes may help those using the index for the first time:

Scope and content. The aim has been to include entries for all persons and places with significant mention in the text, with as many subject entries as were deemed useful. Archaeological sites outside the county and subject entries for objects which are mentioned only for the purpose of comparison have been omitted, unless it appeared that the information had not been published elsewhere.

Persons. Names of people are followed by the name of the parish in connection with which they are mentioned in the text. This does not necessarily mean that the person resided in the parish, but in the majority of cases this is so.

Peers are entered under their family names where known, with cross references from their titles. The main entry for a married woman is under the name of her (latest) husband, with cross references from her maiden name and earlier married names, if known. Common first names are abbreviated according to the list on p. iv.

Places. Names of places are entered under the appropriate civil parish, with cross references only from the more important localities. the boundaries adopted are those shown on the Ordnance Survey Administrative map of 1963. Where changes from the ancient parishes have occurred, there are notes at the head of the sections.

Under each parish heading there is a paragraph of general subject entries arranged alphabetically, followed by separate paragraphs for (a) church, including incumbents, (b) any other specially important buildings, (c) other places, arranged alphabetically. Under (c) will be found all the references to place names mentioned in the text, although some of these may also be included in the general subject paragraph.

Subjects. It is very difficult to be consistent in indexing subjects referred to in articles of such diversity as occur in the Collections, but I have tried to include everything significant that might be sought by users of the index, with as many cross references from alternative headings as seemed desirable. Some large headings, such as Pottery, are sub-divided by period, then alphabetically by find-place, with descriptive notes under each to indicate types. Under the general period headings: Palaeolithic, Neolithic, Bronze Age, Early Iron Age, Roman, Saxon, Medieval, only sites and some general entries have been included, with cross references to headings under which more specific items will be found.

As a rule articles are not analysed, e.g. an article on the history and architecture of a church will have only one entry under the parish (sub-heading church), on the assumption that users will refer to that article if they are interested in any of the features of the church. Any such features of special interest, such as font, screen, etc., will appear in the index under the appropriate subject headings.
