

SURREY CHANTRIES.

BY

THEODORE CRAIB.

THE natural result of the suppression of the monasteries was the dissolving of the chantries, colleges, free-chapels, brotherhoods, and hospitals. Parliament passed an Act (37 Hen. VIII, c. 4) transferring them to the Crown, the ostensible reason being “. . . . the excedinge greate and inestimable charges, costes and expenses which your Majestie hathe had and susteyned and dayly doeth susteyne, as well for the mayntenaunce of theis present warres against the relmes of Fraunce and Scotlande as also for the mayntenaunce of your most roiall estate honor dignitye and estimacon which all your saide lovinge subjectes of naturell duty ben bounde to conserve and increase by all suche wayes and meanes as they can devise.” Thus the aim of Parliament was to transfer that which had been devoted to spiritual work to mere secular objects.

In February of the same year the king appointed Commissioners, who were directed to make a survey of all the chantries, &c., certifying their possessions and revenues, and what had been dissolved or otherwise disposed of since the fourth of February of the 27th of his reign.

On comparing the wording of the Commission with that of the Act of Parliament, one cannot help thinking that the chantries would not have suffered so severely under Henry VIII as they did in the following reign. It appears, that at least for Surrey, the Commission was not generally acted upon: for the only return to it that exists is one giving the value of the Chapel of St. Mary Magdalene in Kingston;¹ unless the Return² showing the value of certain chantries and colleges, to which no date is attached, can also be included.

On 28th January, 1547, however, Henry VIII died and was succeeded by his son Edward VI; and one of the first acts of the new king's Parliament [1 Edw. VI, c. 14] was to direct that all colleges, chantries, &c., should be vested in the king. Archbishop Cranmer and several of the bishops voted against this measure. Burnet³ says that Cranmer endeavoured to have it postponed till the king became of age, in the hope that the money derived from the chantries might then be given to the relief of the parochial clergy. The Commissioners were duly appointed, and a letter under the signet, signed by Somerset, was sent to them urging them to be expeditious.⁴

It should be noted that in one copy of the Commission ten Commissioners are named, whilst in another copy there are twelve, and in one of the certificates there are no less than thirteen. They were not permitted to do their work in a haphazard manner, for minute instructions were issued to them;⁵ and the county was divided among them, each, as a rule, being in charge of a hundred.⁶

The number of parishes accounted for is sixty-one. There are two certificates, one by William Goodwynne, the other (a much fuller one) signed by four of the Commissioners. On comparing them, one notices discrepancies in the values.

The following Returns are transcribed from the originals in the Public Record Office and from copies preserved in the Collection of Loseley MSS. in the possession of Lieut. and Mrs. More-Molyneux McCowen; to whom I am indebted for permission to make the transcript.
