Saxon and Norman London, by John Clark. Museum of London, 1989. 48 pp., illus., £3.95.

RECENTLY archaeology had been providing more and more clues to help with the decipherment of some of the obscure details of the Saxon and Norman periods in London, and that is enough justification for this expanded and rewritten version of a booklet published as recently as 1980. Closely following the format of the popular Pitkin Guides it is, presumably, aiming at a similar market. However, there is a big price gap and it remains to be seen whether the Pitkin buyers will rise to the bait.

It is to be hoped that they will. Despite the brief to fit a quart (or more) into a half-litre jug, the story is clearly told and the graphics designed to match. One or two of the photos (notably the cover) are particularly fine. The booklet is attractive and there seems to be a refreshing lack of destruction by over-designing.

The justifiable claim that archaeology has provided additional clues since 1980 mustn't, of course, lead to the belief that every question has been answered. The 5th century is as obscure as ever: more obscure, perhaps. Even the famous letter from the Emperor Honorius on which so much has been pinned for so long has had doubt cast upon it. Presumably the author accepts the subsequent refutation of the doubt, for he maintains the traditional line: a certain amount of distancing might have been in order, but removal of the letter would leave a rather large vacuum.

One can always pick holes but I can't personally believe the wide, user-friendly stairway up to the door of the White Tower in the (beautifully photographed) reconstruction model. I also can't resist pointing out a tiny lost opportunity. Why, when mentioning the proximity of the Prior of Lewes' house in Bermondsey to the probable location of that of the Earl of Surrey and hinting that there may actually be an identity, does the author not point out that the de Warennes were the patrons of Lewes Priory and had a castle at Lewes? It would have given the author's hint a bit more thrust.

It is a pity, too, that, in the small print at the end – presumably provided by the museum administrators and not by the author – the implication is made that only the London and Middlesex Archaeological Society publishes full accounts of archaeological material from the London area. Why the role of the Surrey Archaeological Society has been ignored, only the bureaucrats can tell us. It is to be hoped that, if there is to be a reprint at any stage, this mistake will be rectified. It is almost worth a correction slip.
