

On the Chancel floor under the east tower arch are collected some old encaustic tiles with yellow quatrefoils on a red ground. On south of chancel is a portion of an old stall with panelled front and poppy heads. The four tower arches are low and exceedingly massive. They are semi-circular and without any ornamentation. Those opening to the nave and chancel are recessed in three orders, on both east and west faces, but it is suggested that originally they were quite solid and plain like those opening to the transepts, and are portions of the ancient Saxon Church, altered in the Norman period, after the Church had been presented to Reading Abbey. There is a chamfered hoodmould of the Norman date, and massive chamfered abacus, and the inner order rests on half round respond shafts with large capitals. The carving on those to the eastern arch is very crude and looks new. Above the east arch on the Chancel side are painted the arms of Reading Abbey, azure three scallop shells or, surmounted by a mitre, of no great antiquity.
