

struck by the size of many of the stones incorporated in the present walls, either relics of an earlier Church, or brought from some of the ancient structures which formerly existed in this neighbourhood. The north doorway (Fig. 46) is of the Decorated period, with undercut hoodmould, and quarter-round moulding to the arch and jambs. The south doorway within the porch is similar, but has a hoodmould terminating on the heads of ecclesiastics. The porch (Fig. 47) is a very interesting specimen of 15th century timber work, though much patched up and weatherworn. It has a well moulded projecting barge board, and arched entrance with solid timber jamb posts, and good open frame work above, most of the beams of the roof being old. It is divided within into two bays by an arch with fillet band on it terminating on heads on the wall plate. On each side of the porch is an open arcade supported on nine shafts. The south Chancel doorway has three grooved or fluted mouldings in the head. All the decorated windows have external dripstones or hoodmoulds, that on the south of the Chapel having a small additional member. The tower (Fig. 48) is lofty with debased battlements, single belfry lights, and small oblong openings in middle stage. On the upper west face is a small ogee headed niche enclosing a mutilated figure, said by some to be St. Nicholas, by others the Virgin and Child.

Near the Church is an old pigeon house, and other remains of the Manor House, and as we return to Didcot we pass the old way-side cross, the steps being original, but the shaft and cross having been recently erected.
