

and one may fairly conclude that in both cases, the head of our Lord is intended to be represented. At the spring of the arch on each side these two outer courses are diverted outwards, so as to leave a blank semi-circular space, the object of which is not apparent. On the middle order we find a series or chain of large beaded circles, the two top ones linked together, the others joined by bands or with a bead within a circle, at their point of union, except at the spring of the arch, where three on the west and two on the east are separated by a double beaded band. On the inner order is a row of beads, and then a course of bold raised zigzag, with leaves and beads enclosed within the outer sides of the chevrons, plain recessed spaces being left between the inner points. The material used is a very white stone, and the design is exceedingly effective. The date of this doorway is probably about 1160, a period when much ornate work was being introduced into our churches.
