I.

Few of the larger Scottish churches of the century immediately preceding the Reformation appear ever to have been finished; but the parish church of Mid-Calder stands conspicuously incomplete even among the imperfect buildings of its style and age. The nave was never begun; and, as will be seen from the accompanying sketch of the interior by Mr James Drummond, R.S.A. (Plate XVIII.), the choir was abruptly stopped, when the walls had reached the point for turning the arch of the groined roof by which it was to be spanned. The writing which I beg to lay before the Society will enable us so far to understand both how the work was left thus half done, and what it would have been if the design of its founder had been accomplished.

The church was a well-endowed parsonage in the gift of the lord of the manor. From the Earls of Fife, from whom it had its old name of Earl's Calder, the manor passed to the Douglasses; and from the Douglasses, about the middle of the fourteenth century, it came, as the marriage dowry of a niece of the Good Sir James, to the knightly house of Sandilands. Early in the sixteenth century the rectory is found in the possession of Master Peter Sandilands, a younger son of the sixth Knight of Calder. It is to this ecclesiastic that we owe the present church of Mid-Calder. He had raised the walls of the vestry, and laid the foundations of the choir before the year 1542. But he was then an aged man; and seeing, it would appear, that there was little likelihood of himself living to finish the building, he made arrangements for its being completed by his nephew and grand-nephew, Sir James Sandilands of Calder, and John his son and heir. These arrangements were embodied in a formal bond engrossed in the public records, from which I have transcribed it:

Master Peter Sandilands died before the year 1548, when the well-known John Spottiswoode, afterwards Superintendent of Lothian, was presented to the parsonage of Calder. The Knight of Calder, on whom the obligation to complete the church rested in the first instance, became, not long afterwards, an early and distinguished disciple of that Reformation which was, for a time, to bring all church-building to a stand. It was by him that the "First Oration and Petition of the Protestants of Scotland" was presented to the Queen-Regent, in the year 1558. Two years earlier, his house of Calder was the frequent abode of Knox, who there taught the Reformed doctrines to Murray, Erskine, and Argyle. His son was one of the companions of George Wishart when that reformer was taken prisoner, before being committed to the flames, in 1546. Of the two suretisies in the bond, one, Cockburn of Ormiston, was conspicuous as among the first and most zealous converts to the Reformed faith. It was in his house that Wishart was seized.

The plan of the parson of Calder, in 1542, was for a choir of two bays, with a three-sided, apsidal termination, on which a vestry abutted on the east; a low square or oblong central tower, with clock and bells; and a nave of four bays, seven feet longer and five feet broader than the choir.

Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland
Both choir and nave were to have groined roofs, and to be covered with stone. There were to be four buttresses on either side of the nave, as well as on the south side of the choir, all of ashlar, and surmounted by finials. The walls of the nave were to be of rubble, as well as the lower part of the north wall of the choir, against which, it would seem, some sort of enclosure was to be raised. There was to be a turret with a newel stair leading to the rood-loft and belfry, in the north angle between the central tower and the choir. There were to be three pointed windows in the south wall of the choir; four flat-lintelled windows, each ten feet wide, in the south wall of the nave; a pointed window, twelve feet wide, in the west gable of the nave, and two windows in the east gable of the choir, above the vestry. All the windows were to have mullions, with lockets of iron to which the glass might be fastened. The pointed windows were to have “cornettis” of stone or of iron, as might be found most convenient. There was to be a door with a plain porch between two of the buttresses on the south side of the nave, the porch having fixed seats on either side, and a stone roof. There was to be another door under the window in the west gable of the nave. Both nave and choir were to have water tables, or weather mouldings, resting on corbels, and channelled with lead, to carry off the water from the roof. The choir was to be well paved, with steps leading to the altar, which was to be of ashlar stone. There were to be two holy water stoups, one in the nave and one in the choir.

Of this plan, so far as can now be discovered, scarcely a half was executed. The walls of the vestry and choir were built, but the latter never received its vaulted roof. For two small windows in its east gable above the vestry, one large light was substituted. If the buttresses were crowned with the large finials, so characteristic of that age, no trace of them is now to be found. The top of the tower is comparatively modern, leaving us room to doubt whether or not this part of the church had been completed. Not even the foundations of the nave were laid. The vestry, I should add, has long been used as the burying-place of the Lords of Torphichen. Two pinnacles, showing traces of early renaissance, spring from its external angles, one of them bearing a legend commemorative of the founder—Petrus fecit: ne corrvm.¹
