 "BARTON" OR "MANOR" FARM, NYE-TMBER, PAGHAM, THE. By H. L. F.
 GUERMONPREZ, A. R. I. B. A., AND PHILIP M. JOHNSTON, 145-154. The situation of the farm, 145. The Manor shown in Domesday as in the hands of the Archbishops of Canterbury; no record of especial interest known, 146. The building before dismantlement used as a farmhouse; the discovery of the N.W. portion at one time used as a chapel; the dimensions of same; a trefoil-headed piscina found, 147. The window dressings of the Early English style; the variety of stone used, 148. A series of through holes; probable use of these; the probable remains of an early Saxon "aula," 149. Description of door openings in the same; the dressing of stones one of especial interest, 150. Another building in close proximity, but of later date; measurements of same, 152. An interesting question as to the date of the "aula;" the probability of its being an unique specimen of the "Hall of the Manor," 153. Interesting notes respecting the building,

BODIAM CASTLE. By HAROLD SANDS, M.I.M.E., 114-133. The various matters of interest which have escaped the notice of previous authors on the castle, 114. The site chosen for the castle; its close proximity to the Rother; the position of the inner ward of the castle, 115. The castle built by Royal license in 1386; the building probably commenced 13 years later; description and dimensions of the towers, 116. Some peculiar circular apertures and their probable use; probably a line of exterior defences at one time, 117, and also an harbour; discovery of an ancient ship in close proximity; description of the towers, 118. The kitchen of the Lord of the castle and the remains of the huge fireplace; dimensions of the large hall, 119. Particulars of the inner buildings; the exterior walls having only large windows in the south and east fronts, the most inaccessible to an attack, 120. The chapel; in the south wall a piscina; the western portion of the chapel probably one of two storeys; similar examples in other castles; the towers probably covered by high conical roofs, 121. Probable reason for this; dimensions of the battlements, 122. A large number of remains of fireplaces to be seen; an erroneous account respecting the castle mural latrine chambers, 123. The armorial bearings over the north gate; the absence of a well, but probably one in the centre of the courtyard; the materials used in the building of the castle, 124. The ground plan similar to that of Villandraut Castle and also somewhat similar to others, 125. Description of Bolton Castle and its peculiar situation; an interesting account of it by Leyland, the antiquary, 127. Similar examples of Bodiam Castle in Scotland and Ireland, 128. The outworks of the castle; the remains of a half-octagonal pier; an important point in respect to this; the deadly power of the longbow, 129. The use of stone shot; probably a wooden bridge connecting the castle to the octagonal island; reasons for this, 130. These double outworks a common feature of the period; description of some barbicans, 131. The funds for the building of the castle probably spoil from warfare abroad; probably no large siege ever taken place, but still remains of earthworks, 132. Its position one of reliance and strength, 133.

Bodiam Castle, 114, 115, 116, 122, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 132, 133.

 CHURCHES, THREE EAST SUSSEX: BATTLE, ICKLESHAM, PEASMARSH. A STUDY OF THEIR ARCHITECTURAL HISTORY. By GREVILLE M. LIVETT, Vicar of Wateringbury, Kent. PART I., BATTLE, 69-93. The church from the road has an appearance of a fifteenth century building, 69. The clerestory of the nave of early work; the chancel probably of the same date; the interior of the church of massive proportions; a difference of opinion as to the date of the nave, 70. The nave probably built in the thirteenth century; reasons for this; the nave and chancel nearly contemporary works, 71. The character of the mouldings point to the date of about 1230; the early-Norman church, 72. The church an enlargement of an earlier building; a record as to the building; no trace of the original church; dimensions of probable similar churches, 73. Probable position of original nave, 74. A brief description of a mental picture of the early-Norman church, 75. The later-Norman church; description of the remains of; the additions made by the builders, 76. Erection of the aisles, 77. A curious bit of masonry in the north wall of the chancel; an impossible theory of a central tower built on the same; the Early English

- church; the nave and the chancel probably erected simultaneously by the monks and parishioners; similarity of details as well as remarkable difference in the work, 78. The probable mode of construction of the church, 79. Description of the aisles, 80. The chancel a most interesting architectural study; the unity of design showing the work of one date, the early part of the thirteenth century, 81. The treatment of the south wall of the early-Norman chancel; a difficulty of the architect in treating the bit of old wall between the arch and the new wall arcade, 82. A difficulty overcome in the building; the low chapel arch of especial interest, 83. Description of the same; description of a part of one of the destroyed arches, 84. The enrichment of the wall arcades not an uncommon design in the thirteenth century, 85. Description of an interesting cruet recess, with dimensions of the same; the panel of especial interest, 86. Probable design of the original Early English piscina; the removal of the piscina, probably caused to make room for a cruet recess for the high altar, 87. The fourteenth and fifteenth century additions to the church, 88. The erection of the tower at the west end of the Early English nave; description of the same, 89. A peculiar skewed lancet, opening suggestions as to the original Norman church, 90. Churches with similar examples of side towers, 91. Interesting particulars with respect to the building of aisles and enlarging small early chancels, 92. The leading features of the nave, with names of churches with similar ones, 93.

 IRON WORK AND POTTERY, SUSSEX. By CHARLES DAWSON, F.S.A., F.G.S., 1-62. Iron probably made in the southern part of England not later than the fourth or fifth century, B.C., 1. The introduction of iron probably brought by the Belgic settlers; numerous specimens of this class of work to be seen in the museums; large remains of Roman works now to be seen, 2. A lapse of the industry after the break-up of the Romans; British civilization; the first record of the revival of the industry so late as the time of Henry III.; a grant to Lewes at this time to repair the town walls by levying tolls on the carriage of iron, 3. Interesting discovery of a Romano-British casting, 4. Analysis of a portion of the same; a probable form of moulding before the revival of cast iron; reasons for this, 5. Description of the Wealden ironstone; the amount required to make thirteen tons of pig-iron, 6. An interesting account of making cast or pig-iron, 7. The process adopted in Lancashire for making the same, 8. Description of the ore in the Weald, with the method of converting the same; an account of a furnace, with dimensions of same, 10. The manner of working it, 11. Description of an iron forge, 13. The main staple industry of the iron trade in Sussex the manufacture of "pig" and "bar-iron;" but few specimens of good ornamental wrought iron work in Sussex, 14. Various works of manufacture in the Weald of iron; description of the early pieces of ordnance, 15. Description and dimensions of a curious piece of ordnance; the use of cannon commenced much earlier abroad than in England; an account of some places where used, 16. All ordnance for the protection of the south coast in 1586 probably furnished by the Wealden furnaces; description of a portion of cannon probably cast by Ralph Hogge, of Buxted, 17. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries a large trade done in the Wealden county in respect to ordnance; in the early half of the last century not a difficult matter to meet men who had worked in the furnaces for the casting of guns, 18. The specimens of fire-backs in Sussex of endless variety; the various types of the same and means of identifying the period to which they belong, 19. Particulars of some of the designs used and also a description of some unique casts, 20. An account of some wooden models from which they were cast, 21. The use of brand-irons probably as ancient as that of fire-backs; a definition of the term "andiron;" an early example of a dated brand-iron, 22. A large manufacture of Sussex horseshoes and nails for an expedition; the discussion of early horseshoes a vexed one; some curious examples, 23. The theory of these horseshoes being designed for malformations of the hoof a curious one, 24. A peculiar feature of the tall wrought iron fire-dog; the open cup-like top; a peculiarity as to why they were made in this way; the probable use for the same; a very few wrought iron gates of Sussex manufacture to be seen, or examples of wrought iron standards for signboards; the date of the last Sussex foundry-fire somewhat doubtful; some authorities for the date, 25. The trade of charcoal-burning still carried on in Sussex; the commodities of Sussex in 1610, 26. Sussex pottery; description of the ware and an analysis of the same, 28. The various methods of ornamentation; the modern pottery of different character to the old, 29. The specimens of the early class now very rare; some unique specimens at the Lewes Exhibition, 30. Description of the old Sussex pottery-pig and the means of distinguishing them from the modern variety, 31. Particulars of some of the various exhibits on loan and the probable sites of the old potteries, 32. Catalogue of iron work specimens now on view at Lewes Castle, 33-42. Exhibits lent by the South Kensington Museum, 43-46. Sussex cast-iron fire-backs, 47-52. Sussex brand-irons or fire-dogs, 53-54. Miscellaneous specimens of Sussex pottery, 55-59. Specimens of Sussex pottery in the British Museum, 60. The like in Bethnal Green and Brighton Museums, 61-62.

LYMINSTER, THE CHURCH OF, AND THE CHAPEL OF WARNINGCAMP, WITH SOME NOTICE OF THE DEPENDENT MANORS. By PHILIP MAINWARING JOHNSTON, 195-230. A difficulty as to the spelling of the name, 195. References in the Domesday Survey respecting the same; the church or chapel of Warningcamp founded after the Conquest, 196. The name of "Non-neminstre" probably designates that part now known as Lyminster; Toddington and Warningcamp both settlements of great antiquity; types of buildings there, 197. The definition of the name Warningcamp, and the probable site of the chapel, 199. a deed relating to the chapel; the hamlet of Wick also considered a portion of Lyminster parish; the site of the famous Priory of St. Bartholomew of Pyneham in the parish of Lyminster, 200. A description of the remains of the Priory, 201. The probable aspect of Lyminster during the Domesday Survey, 202. A reference to the celebrated Knucker-hole evidence that Lyminster was at one time an important place, 203. The connection of Alfred the Great with Lyminster; the foundation of the Nunnery, 204. The church a most interesting one as showing the various changes; the nave, a spacious Saxon one; an aisle and chapel added to the North side in 1170; the massive tower of slightly later date; two rather clumsy lancet windows in the South wall of the nave, these of the date about 1260; a piscina worked in chalk at the end of the aisle, probably of the same date, 205. The chancel arch, narrow and lofty, the principal relic of the pre-Conquest period, 207. Traces of a small door, presumably Saxon, said to have been discovered in the S.W. corner of the chancel; the North arcade and aisle a good example of transitional Norman work; the walls of the nave probably raised at this period, 208. The principal door of the Saxon church, probably that of which the arch still remains in the South wall of the nave, 211. All the windows, with the exception of one, modern; a curious piscina to be seen in the eastern part of the South wall of the chancel; description of the chancel roof; some interesting features relating to the church, 212. The font, a massive one of Sussex marble, probably of late twelfth century date; the ancient roof of the nave a fine example of carpentry; the weight of this the probable source of weakness at various times in the building, 213. A probability of the timber coming from the roof of the destroyed Lady Chapel; traces of a fire on the stonework of the arcade; traces of early work found during further repairs, 214. Some interesting discoveries; notes explaining the illustrations to the paper, 215-222. List of the Vicars of Lyminster, 222, 223.  ROMAN INSCRIPTION FROM WORTHING, A. BY F. HAVERFIELD, M.A., F.S.A.,

Hon. F.S.A., Scot., 155-162. The discovery of the stone, description and size, with inscription on same, 155. The discovery one of great interest, as showing Worthing at one time of Romano-British occupation, 156. A doubt as to the stone being a milestone, 157, as no traces yet discovered of a Roman road; the probability of the same being a memorial slab, 158. List of similar stones found, 159; some of these undoubtedly milestones. A comparison of the various stones, 160. A probable reason for the use of this stone, 161.
