

WILMINGTON PRIORY: HISTORICAL NOTES.

BY THE REV. W. BUDGEN, F.S.A.

THE village of Wilmington, lying on the north side of the Downs nearly mid-way between Lewes and Eastbourne, is widely known, at least by name, through its association with the great hill-side figure, the "Giant" or "Long Man" of Wilmington. Less well known, but more important in historical and archaeological interest, is the group of buildings, partly in ruins, close to the parish church on the south side, which consist almost entirely of remains of the medieval Priory of Wilmington. As Mr. W. H. Godfrey has mentioned in his architectural description, the Priory buildings—and also the "Long Man"—are now vested in the Sussex Archæological Trust with a view to their preservation. It would have been a serious loss if the buildings had been allowed to become derelict. Apart from their inherent value as thirteenth and fourteenth century work, these remains of the old Priory have an interest that should reach far beyond the immediate locality, for they constitute practically the only visible memorial of the sometime important Benedictine Abbey of St. Mary of Grestain in Normandy to which the Priory, with possessions in many parts of England, belonged. While the English priory, with the other alien priories, came to an end in 1414, the Norman abbey continued until 1757, but its buildings have been demolished and its archives have perished.

The association of the Abbey with England was of the closest character. At one time a large proportion of its revenues was derived from English estates; the Abbot held a prebendal stall in Chichester Cathedral; and in the thirteenth century one of the abbots spent nearly two years continuously in England, thereby incurring a severe reprimand from his Norman Diocesan for the neglect of his abbey and the scandal resulting therefrom.

The Abbey owed its foundation to Herluin de Contaville, a man of whom little is known personally, but whose family came into great prominence through their connection with William the Conqueror. William, as is well known, was the illegitimate son of Robert, Duke of Normandy, who was variously nicknamed "le Magnifique," "le Liberal," or "le Diable," according to the mood of the moment. William's mother, Arlette, later became the wife of Herluin de Contaville, and by this marriage there were two sons, Robert of Mortain and Odo, afterwards Bishop of Bayeux, both of them active participants in the councils of their half-brother, the Conqueror, and sharers in the spoils of the Conquest. Of the two brothers the interest of Sussex is centred in Robert of Mortain, for, besides receiving many manors elsewhere in England, he was one of the five companions of William between whom the county of Sussex was divided, Robert's portion being the Rape of Pevensey.

Liberal in his benefactions to the Abbey of his father's foundation, his gifts included manors and lands both in Normandy and England. Among the latter the manor of Wilmington with its associated lands was one of the more important, and, being conveniently situated for communication with Normandy, the Priory founded there became the responsible head of all the English estates of the Abbey.

The Priory and its history have been dealt with in some detail by the Rev. G. M. Cooper in Vol. IV. of our Collections, but additional material has become available during the 74 years since that paper was written. Further, Mr. Cooper said little about the history of the Abbey apart from Wilmington, and we feel that for a right appreciation of the story of our Priory some knowledge of the course of events concerning the mother house in Normandy is essential. The material for this is now accessible in a monograph on the Abbey by a French writer, M. Chas. Bréard, published in 1904,¹ in which all the available information from the Norman side is brought together. M. Bréard tells, with regret, that in the absence of the Abbey archives, which appear to have perished, he has had to rely for many of his details upon the Neustria Pia and Gallia Christiana, the compilers of which had access to documents no longer in existence. He has collected a large number of historical documents from various sources, extending from 1189 to 1790, but, curiously, the English records have been almost entirely neglected. With one or two small exceptions, the two confirmatory Charters of Richard I. and Edward II. are the only documents he gives from English sources, and there is not even a suggestion of the existence of a priory at Wilmington, or of its suppression.

As the best way of dealing with a rather complicated matter, we propose to combine in chronicle form the story of the Abbey and Priory, including such information as may be material from M. Bréard's book.

1050. The Abbey was founded at Grestain on the site of a chapel dedicated to the Virgin and endowed by Herluin de Contaville.²

1066–1086. Between the date of the Conquest and the compilation of Domesday Book the Abbey was further endowed. English estates were given by the Conqueror and by Robert of Mortain and his wife, Maud de Montgomery, their donations including manors, tithes and churches in Sussex, Northants, Bucks, Suffolk and Cambs. The Domesday survey shows the Abbey holding manors and lands in these various counties.

c. 1100. Robert of Mortain died about 1100,³ his first wife Maud having predeceased him between 1085 and 1088.⁴ Both were buried in the Abbey at Grestain. Their son William, Count of Mortain, succeeded to the estates and added to the Abbey endowments property both in England and Normandy, but having embraced the cause of Robert, Duke of Normandy, who rose in opposition to his brother, Henry I., he was taken prisoner at the battle of Tenchebrai in 1106, and his estates were forfeited. M. Bréard says that his eyes were put out, and that after 30 years (nearly) of close captivity he died in 1134.

1122. The village and Abbey of Grestain were destroyed by fire, which appears to have been accidental, but the next year, in consequence of a revolt in the district, the country round was ravaged by Henry I., and it is improbable that Grestain escaped.⁵

1139. Dedication of the second portion—probably the nave—of the new church of Grestain. The choir had been consecrated previously, and the cemetery received benediction, 1141–42.⁶

1180. WILLIAM HUBAND (OR DE EXETER) became the fifth Abbot. Almost immediately he came over to England and remained for nearly two years “given up to worldly occupations.” At the peremptory command of the Bishop of Liseux he returned to Grestain, but very soon crossed to England again. He was again severely reprimanded and threatened with ex-communication. The condition of affairs in the Abbey was scandalous. Letters addressed by the Bishop to the Abbot and also to the Pope, Alexander III., are given by M. Bréard. In 1185 the Abbot was removed to a less important House, and some of the monks were also “translated” elsewhere.⁷ Having regard to the alternative surname given to this Abbot, it is noticeable that in the gifts to the Abbey confirmed by the charter of Edward II. in 1316 there is one by Robert de Spire of a house in Exeter, which the Abbey held of him, with $3\frac{1}{2}$ acres of land. It is possible that we have an echo of the Abbot's "worldly" activities in the Pipe Rolls for the years 1184-1186, where the Abbot of Grestene is entered as owing half a mark for encroachment in the county of Southants. Under the heading of the counties of Bucks. and Beds. the sheriff accounts for 16s. 8d. rent from the Abbot of Gresteng (sic).

1189-1197. RAOUL is Abbot. He is said to have been the nominee of Richard I., and from this monarch he obtained two charters confirming gifts made to the Abbey, one relating to their estates in Normandy, the other to the Abbey's English possessions.

1197. ROBERT becomes Abbot.⁸ It was during his abbacy that the Prebend of Wilmington in Chichester Cathedral was created by the then bishop, Seffrid II. (1180-1204). The Abbot, desiring to become a Canon, gave to the Cathedral the church of Ferles (West Firle); a prebend was constituted out of the churches of Wilmington, Willingdon and Eastdean (near Eastbourne) and given to the Abbot and his successors, with a stall in the choir.⁹ The churches of Wilmington and Eastdean already belonged to the Abbey, and apparently Willingdon was added by way of exchange for Firle. As the Abbot could not keep residence in the cathedral in person he was to appoint a priest-vicar, who should receive from his master the same stipend as the other canons' vicars (i.e. 1 mark), but out of the common fund he was to have 25s. (yearly) instead of the customary 13s. 4d.¹⁰ This prebend is now represented by the Bursalis prebend.¹¹ It must have been before this transfer of Firle Church to the Cathedral that Robert, the Abbot, and the Convent of Grestain granted to William de Coleville a dwelling (herbergagium) next the chancel of the church of Ferles at a rent of 12d. yearly to the church.¹²

The position in regard to Willingdon Church is made clear in the ordinance creating the vicarage in 1204 by Simon, Bishop of Chichester. This document recites that "following in the footsteps" of his predecessor, Seffrid, the Bishop had granted the church of Willingdon to the Abbot and Convent of Grestain, and had instituted Robert the Abbot as rector thereof.¹³

This same Abbot was concerned in an arrangement with Richard de Cumbe and Sibyl his wife, by which the Abbey remitted their right in the church of Westdene (near Eastbourne), except in regard to a portion of 12s. yearly from the church, and Richard de Cumbe and Sibyl in like manner remitted to the Abbey all their right in Friston Church.¹⁴

1230. WILLIAM DE FARNOVILLE is Abbot. There is a discrepancy between the French and English records as to the date of the termination of Robert's abbacy. M. Bréard states that he was present at the Assizes held in 1244,¹⁵ which would make his tenure of the office extend for 46 years. On the other hand, we have a Fine of the year 1230, in which William, Abbot of Grestain, receives a quit-claim concerning 137 acres of land in Westham.¹⁶

1243. JOHN is Prior of Wilmington. This is the first mention we have of a Prior. His name, with that of the Abbot William, occurs in connection with the purchase by the Abbey of 40 acres of land in Westham,¹⁷ in which parish the Abbey already had considerable possessions. These formed the manor of Peelings, to which the Rectory of the church of Westham was attached.

1254. Consecration of the church of the Abbey at Grestain by the Bishop of Liseux. According to M. Bréard (p. 64) this was a new edifice, and not the church that was commenced in 1122. It existed in part until the suppression of the Abbey in 1757.

Important information as to the state of the Church in Normandy at this period is furnished by the Journal of Odo Rigaud, Archbishop of Rouen. He visited Grestain three times between 1249 and 1257, and found nothing seriously amiss. The number of monks varied from 28 in 1254 to 32 in 1257, nearly all of them being priests. The yearly revenues of the Abbey were 2000 pounds tournois (i.e. about £500) in 1249, and £400 in 1257. The keeping of accounts was enjoined. It was reported that the monks living in the priories ate flesh and did not observe fasts; this was to be corrected. The Abbot was old and blind and could take no part in the Offices, but every Sunday he received the Communion.¹⁸

1259. THOMAS is Abbot.¹⁹ The text of a grant by the Abbey, in his time, of land in Willingdon has been preserved in private hands in an Elizabethan copy.²⁰ It is dated in 1261; the Abbey grants to Philip de Tottescompe all the lands which Richard de Tottescompe, his father, sometime held of the Abbey in the parish of Willingdon at Tottescompe, except an acre which Thomas de Tottescomp, uncle of Philip, held. Yearly rent at Wilmington, 5s. Witnesses:—Richard de Hideney, Alexr. de Racton (Ratton), Ralph de Colvyll (a donor to the Abbey), Richard and William de Hamme, Richard Saget, John Campreys brethren, John de Wybe, Will. Turgis. An extent of the property was made on the death of Jop de Tottescomp in 1333,²¹ and it can be clearly identified with a freehold tenement held of Wilmington manor by Robert Parker of Ratton in 1673, described as a messuage farm and lands called Totscombe alias Tascombe, containing 100 acres in Willingdon, at a rent of 5s.²² It is now represented by a farm called Chalk Farm lying at the foot of the Downs below a combe still marked on the O.S. as Tascombe.

1261. ROBERT PYKARD is Prior of Wilmington. He and John le Merse, parson of "Bercamsted," are authorised to appoint attornies in the Abbot's name.²³

In 1267 the Archbishop of Rouen again visited Grestain. Twenty-six monks were in residence there, two were in England, and two at each of the priories in France. The Abbot was enjoined to visit the foreign priories more frequently.²⁴ This statement in regard to the two monks in England is one of the important pieces of information we have been able to gather from the French records. The Abbey was at this time probably at the height of its prosperity, and yet there were only two monks at Wilmington. We may, therefore, conclude that this was the normal number to be resident there, and it would seem that their main business was the management of the Abbey estates in this country.²⁵

1268. WILLIAM DE GYMEGES (? Jumièges) is Prior.²⁶ If the name of this Prior is as suggested, implying possibly that he was a monk of the Abbey of Jumièges, it is of interest, for in 1259 a long-standing dispute between Jumièges and Grestain was settled to the advantage of the latter house.²⁷

1270. REYNOLD is Prior.²⁸

In 1294 trouble arose with France, and, in anticipation of war, it appears that the English possessions of the alien priories were taken into the king's hands. Then, in 1295, it was ordered that all the members of these alien religious houses dwelling within 13 miles of the sea should be removed and placed in other religious houses, under strict supervision, at least 20 miles from the sea. Under this ordinance the Abbot of Chertsey was directed to receive the Prior of Wilmington into his house.²⁹ If this arrangement was actually carried out it was of short duration, for in the following year, 1296, protection was granted to the Prior on condition of paying a certain sum annually to the Exchequer.³⁰

²⁴ Bréard, p. 73.

²⁵ This seems to have been quite usual in alien priories, e.g. at Coggs and Minster Lovel, alien priories in Oxfordshire, in each case two foreigners resided, who were sent over for a few years to look after the English property and then were re-called. 1297. The alien priories were restored.³¹

1299. WILLIAM is Prior of Wilmington. He and the parson of the Church of Bledlaw (belonging to the priory) received letters of protection while going to the Abbot beyond the sea.³²

1302. RAOUL VINCOND (elected Abbot in 1297) was dismissed on complaint of the monks. There were serious disorders among the regular clergy in diocese of Liseux, the Grestain monks were reduced to a very small number, and they remained without an Abbot until 1308.³³

1308. WILLIAM LE VAVASOUR elected Abbot.³⁴ It would appear that during the vacancy the English estates of the Abbey, seized in 1294, had remained in the king's hands, for immediately on the appointment of the new Abbot there is an order to the escheator to deliver the property of the Abbey to him.³⁵ Just as happened after the previous period of disorder in the Abbey, so now, steps were taken to secure its possessions and to have its rights declared. In March, 1314-15, the Abbot obtained a grant of free-warren in the abbey manors of Wilmington, Jevington (i.e. Broughton in Jevington) and Alfriston (Frogfirle),³⁶ and in the same year William de Warrenne granted to the Abbey the customs and freedom of Seaford.³⁷

In 1316 the Abbey received from Edward II. a charter confirming by Inspeximus the important charter granted by Richard I. in 1189, and also confirming subsequent gifts.³⁸ M. Bréard gives this charter in extenso, but dates it wrongly, 1308.³⁹ He also misunderstands its import, for, not finding therein any reference to many of the English manors mentioned in the 1189 charter, he assumes that the Abbey no longer possessed them. In this he is entirely mistaken, as will appear later, in fact, the very next matter of importance in the French documents to which he refers is the exchange, 50 years later, of seven of the supposed lost manors for a valuable estate in Normandy.

1320. WILLIAM (de Blanville or Bauville) is Prior.⁴⁰

A very small incident in the management of the property of the Priory at this period affords a passing glimpse of the domestic establishment maintained by the Prior. He had occasion to make a seizure of the goods and chattels of one of the Abbey tenants at Hellingly, probably by way of distress for rent; and this led to a law-suit by the tenant, William de Norbleton. The Prior and those who made the seizure were the defendants, and among them were at least five persons, whose names indicate that they were servants of the Priory, viz., Henry le Priouresporter, Richard le Priouresporter, William le Priouresporter, Richard le Prioureskeu and Roger le Priourespalfrayman.⁴¹ But the period of peaceful possession was not long.

1324. In anticipation of further warlike operations with France the alien priories were again seized in 18 Edw. II. (1324), and the Returns of the Commissioners who carried out the seizure are preserved showing the value of the possessions of the priories on October 8 in that year.⁴² The goods and chattels of the Wilmington House in their manors of Wilmington, Frogferles (in Alfriston), "Nunington" (probably a mistake for Jevington) and Palyngg (Peeling in Westham) were valued at £300 18s. 11d.—quite a considerable sum. No particulars are given of the manors themselves for the reason that they had been delivered to the Prior as custodian for the King, and we learn from the Pipe Roll of the following year that the annual payment to be made by the Prior for having the custody was £170.⁴³ On the accession of Edward III. in 1327 the fealty due from the Abbot of Grestain to the King for the English manors was received in Normandy by the Abbot of Bec Helouin under a special authority from the King.⁴⁴ This was doubtless in connection with the restoration of the Abbey possessions, which were held in peace for 20 years.

In 1337 the Hundred Years War with France began, and once more the lands and goods of the alien priories were taken into the King's hands. The custody of Wilmington Priory and its property was committed to the Prior at the same rent as before, £170, for which grant he apparently paid £70 in cash.⁴⁵ He was in arrear with his rent in the following year (1338), and it would seem that he excused himself on the ground that he was being pressed for the payment of pre-war debts. At all events, in August of that year the Sheriff of Middlesex was ordered to desist from distraining the Prior for debts, so that he might be able to answer for the rent due to the King.⁴⁶ Five years later the rent had been increased to £200, the Prior to be thereby exempted from all further exactions, charges and impositions. His sureties were Andrew de Medested, chivaler, William de Cessingham and Philip de Endlenewyk, all well known in the district.⁴⁷

In 1343 the exercise of the royal right of Purveyance provided the Prior (still William de Bauville) with a partial "set-off" against the rent due from him, and incidentally it affords some indication of the resources of the Priory at the time. Geoffrey de Say, Admiral of the Fleet, took from Wilmington 19 "beeves" worth £13 6s., and 140 "muttons" worth £7. Henry de Boucy took 8 sacks and 10 cloves of wool worth £32 15s., and John de Ratynden took 6½ sacks and 2 cloves of wool worth £26 3s. The King gave letters to the Prior promising to pay these amounts.⁴⁸

had been appointed proctor-general for the Abbey. The rent to be paid to the King was £200, and among the sureties were Hugh de la Chambre and Philip de Endlenwyk.⁵⁰

1347. We now come to the exchange of manors to which reference has already been made, a transaction arising directly out of the war, which can be fully understood only by the aid of the French documents. Among the prisoners made at the taking of Caen by Edward III. and the Black Prince in July, 1346, there was a Norman seigneur, Jean de Melun, lord of Tanquarville and chamberlain and constable of Normandy. He was conveyed to England with other prisoners, and in the following year he was permitted to return to Normandy on parole that he might arrange, as he says in one of his documents,⁵¹ "for the discharge of the ransom in which I stand bound to the high and mighty prince, my lord Edward, eldest son of the King of England, Prince of Wales." Jean de Melun had large estates in Normandy, and the Abbot and Convent of Grestain had manors in England, which had been "of little or no value to them for 20 years past by reason of the wars and the perils of the sea and thieves and robbers."⁵² An arrangement was come to by which the Abbey agreed to transfer to Jean de Melun seven English manors valued at 30,000 pounds tournois, the Norman seigneur granting in exchange his Barony of Mezidun, and other properties if necessary to make up a yearly income of 1000 pounds tournois; he also undertook to obtain the consent of the Pope and the King of England to the alienation by the Abbey.⁵³

The deed, dated 28 December, 1348,⁵⁴ by which Jean de Melun made his grant, speaks of the seven manors as having been demised to the Prince of Wales for 1000 years, but as we shall see this is not strictly correct. In another document, dated 25 October, 1348,⁵⁵ the names of the manors are given as:— *Nortonne en la contee de Sumestre, Courlz en la contee de Vilers, Rammeraggen en la contee de Supelimpton,*⁵⁶ Merfez en la contee de Buckingham, Grafton en la contee de Northantescira, Creting et Mikefeld en la contee de Suffolk. The manor of Derneford, co. Cambs., seems to be omitted in the transcript of this document.

⁵³ The valuation of the manors is given as "trente mille livres tournois du prix du fleurin à l'escu du coing du roy de France, de bon or et de bon pois de seïne sous et huit deniers tournois." This would seem to make the £ tournois equivalent to 7s. 6d., but its value varied, and even taking it at $\frac{1}{4}$ £ sterling as is not unusual, one cannot help feeling that the price put upon the seven manors was a gross over-valuation.

So much for the story of the exchange as gathered from the French documents. Turning now to the English records we have first the licence by Edward III. dated 27 November, 1348,⁵⁷ in which the names of the manors occur in a more familiar form, viz., Norton, co. Somerset, Connok, co. Wilts., Rammerugge, co. Southampton, Mersh, co. Bucks, Grafton, co. Northants, Derneford, co. Cambs., and Cretyng and Mikelfeld, co. Suffolk. The King gives licence to the Abbot and Convent of Grestain to demise to "the king's merchant Tidemann de Lymbergh" these manors, "which pertain to the priory of Wilmington a cell of their house" for 1000 years saving always to the King during the war as much rent as the Prior would have paid yearly for the manors. This rent, as we see from a later document, was £86 11s. 10d.⁵⁸ It would appear that the churches associated with the manors were not included in the demise, as we find the King presenting to the church of Norton, diocese of Bath and Wells,

⁵⁶ This puzzled M. Bréard, who says in a foot note: "Peut-etre Huntingtonshire."

⁵⁷ Cal. Pat. Rolls, 22 Edw. III.

⁵⁸ Ibid., 23 Edw. III.; this was by no means the first transaction between the royal family of England and Tidemann. In 1343 Tidemann and others were entrusted by the King with the important, but delicate, business of redeeming the great crown which had been pledged in Holland for 45,000 florins, equivalent to £8062 10s. This was successfully carried out, and during the next year Tidemann provided a further sum of £778 for the recovery of certain jewels belonging to the King deposited with merchants in Cologne. Further, in 1347, Prince Edward, as Duke of Cornwall, leased to Tideman de Lymbergh the coinage of the stannary of the Duchy of Cornwall for 3 years at a rent of 3500 marks yearly. Cal. Pat. Rolls.

in February, 1348–9, and to the church of Little Cretyng, diocese of Norwich, in July, 1349.⁵⁹

The transaction, so far as Tidemann was concerned, was completed in 1350, when he conveyed the seven manors to Sir Thomas Pole,⁶⁰ the King having granted licence for their sale to any Englishman, so long as it was not in mortmain, and Tidemann having compounded for the yearly rent.⁶¹

This alienation of the Abbey manors necessitated a modification of an arrangement previously made by the King in regard to a part of the yearly rent due from the Prior for the custody of the Abbey possessions. In 1348 the King had ordered the Prior to pay £85 out of the rent to Eleanor la Bottillere (later described as the King's kinswoman), late the wife of James le Boteller, Earl of Ormond.⁶² In 1349 the Countess and Thomas de Daggeworth, whom she had married, complained that they could not obtain due payment from the Prior by reason of the manors being held by Tidemann de Limbergh, and thereupon the King granted that they should receive the amount from Tidemann. Then, in 1350, when Tidemann compounded with the King for his rent, it was provided that the Countess and her husband should receive the same sum yearly at the Exchequer so long as the priory remained in the King's hands.⁶³

1349. JOHN PICOT was appointed Prior—Peter Chryspyn being dead—and received the custody of the priory and remaining lands, rendering to the King so much of the original farm of £200 as remained due.⁶⁴ This remnant seems to have been agreed at £20, and in 1351 the Prior had licence to cut and sell trees to this value in his wood at Wilmington to pay his farm to the Crown.⁶⁵

1360. The peace of Bretigny between England and France was signed, and in due course the lands of the alien priories were restored. Irregular warfare, however, continued in Normandy. M. Bréard says that in 1361 a band of Englishmen and adventurers of every country took up their quarters in the Abbey of Grestain, which had been pillaged and probably in part destroyed in 1358, and solidly repaired it. On the 15th November, 1364, "Anglo-Navarrois" soldiers attacked and took the Abbey and occupied it for 9 months.⁶⁶

1370. After an undisturbed period of less than 10 years the possessions of the alien priories were again taken into the King's hands "on account of the rupture by the French of the peace lately made at Calais." The keeping of Wilmington Priory and all its lands and possessions was committed to John de Valle, the Prior, for a yearly farm of £20, his sureties being William de Enlenewyk and John Piers.⁶⁷ In 1374 the rent was increased to 50 marks, viz., the ancient farm of £20 and 20 marks of increment, the Prior to pay tenths with the rest of the clergy.

In connection with this seizure of 1370 an Extent of the possessions of the Priory was made,⁶⁸ which supplies important information, for it not only gives particulars of what the Priory still held, but also of property which, for the time being at least, it had ceased to enjoy. The document gives evidence of some oppression and some losses, but nothing like so extensive as has been supposed. To take one example, Mr. Cooper (S.A.C., IV., 52) hints that the alienation of the seven manors to Tidemann de Lymbergh was probably forced upon the Abbey, whereas the light thrown on this transaction by the French documents makes clear that it was an excellent bargain, greatly to the advantage of the Abbey.

1372. The inclusion of "the advowson of the Priory of Wilmington" in the King's grant of the Honour of Aquila to John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, in 1372,⁶⁹ is at first sight a little puzzling. But it was no new thing for the over-lordship of the manor to belong to the Honour of Aquila, for when Queen

Margaret, mother of Edward II., had a grant of the Honour in 1314, the Abbot of Grestain was required to do fealty and service to her for the lands and tenements held by him in Sussex.⁷⁰ It would seem that the patronage of the Priory was claimed by the Crown on the ground that it was, in part at least, a royal foundation, by reason of the gift by William the Conqueror of the manor of Peniton with Ramridge, co. Southants.

1375. THOMAS AUNCELL is Prior. The keeping of the priory was committed to him at the same rent as before, he paying tenths and finding the chantries, alms, and other divine services anciently ordained in the priory, and keeping up all the houses and buildings thereof. Roger Gosselyn of Fyrlle and John atte Doune were his mainpernors.⁷¹

1377. JEAN PICOT is mentioned by M. Bréard as Abbot, about whom, he says, nothing is known. It seems probable that this is another instance of a former prior of Wilmington acceding to the abbacy; John Picot, as we have seen, was prior in 1349.

It would appear that the Wilmington priors were not sufficiently liberal in the rent offered by them to the King, and the neighbouring priory of Michelham came forward as a higher bidder, the custody of Wilmington being granted to them in 1379 at a rent of £100 to the King and an additional 20 marks to the Prior of Wilmington for life, and afterward to the King. Notwithstanding this arrangement, the King granted the priory to James de Berners on October 6, 1385, in satisfaction of a promised annuity of £100. The Prior of Michelham petitioned the King against this grant, pleading that he took the lease "in order to avert the ruin and damage that might have befallen the priory of Wilmington if it had fallen into the hands of laymen," and that he had been put to great expense in restoration of the buildings, in keeping out the sea and in many other ways.⁷² The only relief obtained by the Prior of Michelham was permission to dispose of all the goods of Wilmington which were his before the grant to Sir James Berners.⁷³

For the next 20 years the priory, when in the King's hands, continued to be treated as a convenient piece of revenue producing property to be granted first to one person and then to another who had monetary claims against the King; and, needless to say, the principal object of the grantees was to make as much as possible out of the concession. It is not surprising, therefore, that the buildings were neglected and that claims should arise in respect of waste and destruction; it is doubtful even whether the prior of Michelham, notwithstanding his protestations, was much better than the laymen. In 1386 Sir Edward Dalingridge and two other knights were appointed to enquire into these happenings during the time of the prior of Michelham and other farmers. Then in 1389, Sir Edward himself had a grant of the priory in respect of a fee of 100 marks a year due from the King for his services, Sir Edward paying 10 marks a year in addition, making an equivalent rent of 110 marks. On his death in 1393 the tables were turned and the prior of Michelham had a share in assessing the serious waste and destruction allowed and committed by Sir Edward in the possessions of the priory. This assessment, which gives important details of the buildings, is printed as an Appendix to this paper.

After Sir Edward Dalingridge's death the Bishop of Chichester (Richard Mitford) appears to have held the priory at a rent, and in 1394 the King granted to him all moneys which should be found due from previous farmers, so that, when recovered, the amounts might be applied to repairs. A year later, in consideration of the great expense of the Bishop, especially in the King's Scotch and Irish expeditions, he was relieved of his rent for the custody of the priory, on condition of maintaining it in divine service and in lands, buildings, etc., without waste, and bearing all charges thereon. In 1398 the grant to the Bishop (who had been translated to Salisbury) of the monies to be recovered for waste was renewed, such waste, "at great expense to the Bishop," having been found by inquisition to have been done to the value of £11 by Richard Hall and Stephen Holt, late farmers of the priory, and to the value of £58 5s. 6d. by Thomas Wysbech (Sir Edward Dalingridge's co-grantee) and others.⁷⁴

In 1396 a truce was made with France for 25 years, but the alien priories and their possessions do not appear to have been immediately restored, for in 1398 the King presented a vicar to Willingdon Church, one of the benefices belonging to Wilmington.⁷⁵ The truce enabled the Abbot of Grestain to come to England, perhaps in connection with the return of the Abbey possessions, and he was present as Prebendary of Wilmington at Bishop Wm. Rede's Visitation at Chichester in 1397, and again in 1402.⁷⁶ This Abbot was probably Jean de Foussi, Doctor of Canon Law, who died at Paris in 1407. His burial at Cluny points to his having belonged to the Cluniac order.⁷⁷

1401. WALTER BRYSTOWE, the last prior, took the oath of obedience to the Bishop of Chichester and his lawful ministers on October 14, 1401, in the church of St. John, Southover.⁷⁸ He was still in charge of the priory in 1403, when, with other alien priories, it was for the last time resumed into the King's hands.⁷⁹

During the six or seven years of peaceful occupation of the priory by its rightful owners probably some reparations were executed and some re-stocking took place, for when the Crown grants began again a ⁷⁹ Acts of the Privy Council, Vol. I., 195. Mr. Salzman (V.C.H. Sussex, II., p. 122) mentions that in the Pipe Roll, 6 Hen. IV., Walter Bristow is described as a Cluniac monk. The suggestion made above that the Abbot at this time was a member of this Order may have a bearing on Bristow's appointment as Prior.

considerably higher annual value was put upon the priory. Thus, on November 20, 1403, a grant of it was made to William Tristour, the King's saddler, and Walter atte Water, clerk, and William Swan, clerk, as in payment of 210 marks yearly in respect of a debt of £600 for saddlery supplied.⁸⁰ In 1405 it was granted to Sir Richard de Arundell in lieu of an annuity of 100 marks given by the King six years earlier, the priory being taken as worth 200 marks yearly and Sir Richard being answerable to the King for the surplus.⁸¹

It is noticeable that in these grants the maintenance of divine service in the priory is in most cases specifically required, and where the grant is to a layman there is commonly associated with him a priest, who, probably, would be responsible for such services. William Tristour, the saddler, had two clerks included with him in his grant, and associated with Sir Edward Dalingridge in an earlier grant there was Thomas Wysbech, chaplain. To this association Thomas Wysbech probably owed his presentation by the Crown, in 1395, to the church of Hartfield, belonging to the priory. In 1392 the right of next presentation to this church had been granted to Sir Edward Dallingridge,⁸² but he died before the vacancy occurred.

The final stage in the history of the priory was reached when, on July 21, 1413, the priory and the manor of Wilmington and all manors, lands and possessions in Sussex late belonging to the Abbey of Grestain and valued at 240 marks yearly were granted by the King to the Dean and Chapter of Chichester to hold during the war or as long as they should be in the King's hands, without paying anything therefor, for the relief and support of the cathedral and of divine service therein and for celebrating masses for the King and his ancestors and for Nicholas Mortymer, late the King's minister, who was buried in the chapel of S. Mary in the cathedral.⁸³ In the following year, as a result of a petition by the Dean and Chapter to the King in Parliament, fresh letters patent, dated 7 November, 2 Henry V. (1414),⁸⁴ were issued renewing the previous grant and making it permanent. Emphasis seems to be intentionally laid on the priory and prebend being of the foundation of the King's predecessors and of his patronage, and licence was given to the Dean and Chapter to appropriate and hold all that was included in the grant to their own uses, the same to be held of the King in capite.

During the period of 150 years, in which the late priory possessions remained in the hands of the Dean and Chapter, there is only one matter calling for special mention, and that is the Augmentation or New Endowment of the Vicarage of Wilmington in 1541 (see Appendix). This affords some useful information about the priory premises, with which Mr. Godfrey deals in his architectural description, and we need only say here that its effect was to constitute as a vicarage house a portion of the old buildings in which the vicar, Henry Marshall, was then living.⁸⁵ A portion of tithes in the parish of Arlington called the tithe of Mylton was appropriated to the vicar, as were also three small pieces of land, on one of which the present vicarage stands.

In 1565, in pursuance of an agreement for an exchange of manors and lands with Sir Richard Sackville, the Dean and Chapter granted to Queen Elizabeth, with a view to their re-grant to Sir Richard, what appear to be the whole of the Sussex possessions of the late priory, with the exception of certain specified churches and tithes.

There is no reason to think that this change of ownership of the Wilmington property to any degree affected the status of the house. It was a manor house, and accommodation for the holding of courts would be necessary, but it was also a farm-house in the sense that the occupant was responsible for the cultivation of over 800 acres of demesne lands attached thereto. We have no information about the tenants during this period, any more than we have during the Dean and Chapter period, except in one case. Thomas Culpeper, belonging to a well-known Sussex family (see S.A.C., XLVII., 47), resided there under a lease from Lord Buckhurst; he died on October 7, 1603, and was buried in Wilmington Church. In his will, dated October 22, 1602, he is described as Thomas Culpeper, of Wilmington, Esquire.⁸⁶ His widow, Elizabeth Culpeper, continued to reside at Wilmington, and died there in 1606. John Colepeper, the nephew of Thomas, was settled at Folkington, the adjoining parish, which also belonged to Lord Buckhurst, and he was buried at Wilmington on October 6, 1607.

One change occurring at this period was that the north wing of the priory buildings ceased to be occupied as the vicarage, and was re-incorporated in the manor house. In a Terrier of the vicarage endowments, dated 23 July, 1635, it is stated that "by right and composition a vicarage house adjoining to the manor house with the garden belongs to the vicarage, but the vicar of late hath not enjoyed it nor had any consideration for it, the same being appropriated to the manor house." A house, either specially erected or already existing on a piece of vicarage glebe land called Pyngwell Haw at some date unknown became the vicarage house. A new house was built by Edward Lord, the vicar, in 1744. It was not unnecessarily large, the ground plot being 35 feet by 27 feet, four rooms upon a floor, and the contract price with the old materials was £200.⁸⁷

The Wilmington estate in or about the year 1700 descended to Spencer Compton, second son of the third Earl of Northampton, his mother being one of the three Sackville co-heiresses. He was Speaker of the House of Commons from 1715 to 1727, and when he was subsequently raised to the peerage he took his title (Baron Wilmington) from this estate. The property passed from the Compton family to that of Cavendish in 1782 by the marriage of Lady Elizabeth Compton with Lord George Cavendish. Wilmington farm now belongs to Lt.-Col. Roland V. Gwynne, D.L., D.S.O., by purchase from the Duke of Devonshire.

After the above paper was in type a booklet, published at Le Havre, by the Rev. C. H. D. Grimes, M.A., F.R.G.S., F.R.Hist.S., giving an account of Grestain Abbey, based upon M. Bréard's work, came under my notice. From this, with its accompanying illustrations, it appears that some slight remnants of the Abbey buildings still exist and form part of more modern structures.

CHICHESTER EPISCOPAL REGISTER DAY [f. 24 r.].

Augmentation or New Endowment of the Vicarage of Wylmyngton.

Richard (Sampson), Bishop, wishing to increase the revenues of the Vicarage of Wylmyngton to provide for more generous hospitality among the parishioners, with the consent of William (Fleshmonger) the Dean, and the Chapter, Rectors and Patrons of the Vicarage, and of Mr. Henry Marshall, Vicar, and [f. 24 v.] at the request of the latter, orders as follows:—The said Vicar and his successors shall have the Vicarage house there, where Henry now dwells, next to the eastern corner of the great old hall of the Manor of Wylmyngton on the north side, containing from north to south 18 ft. and from west to east 30 ft., with the chambers above and below built and belonging to the Vicarage, together with the kitchen on the south of the Vicarage, newly built, also the small court (curtilagium) enclosed between the kitchen and the said house, also the garden on the east of the Manor, enclosed by pales, lying between the Manor and its garden, containing in breadth 57 ft. from the wall on the east of it to the said pales, reserving to the Dean and Chapter and to any Canon when there on the business of the Church the right of walking in the garden and of the use of the kitchen. The Vicar shall have all tithes, greater and lesser, and all oblations, mortuaries, profits and pasturage of the churchyard, and all other emoluments of the Church, except tithes of corn (garbarum), lambs, wool, hay, calves, milk, cheese, butter, flax, hemp, with all other real (realibus) tithes, greater or lesser, growing, etc., on (demesne) lands of the Manor, which are reserved to the Rectors. The Vicars shall also have the meadow called Prestwysh, containing 1 acre, and a croft called Monkyn pynd, containing 1 acre, and another croft called Pyngwellis haw with a barn there lately built, also the right of access to the Vicarage by the door on the north of the new-built kitchen. [f. 25 r.] The Vicars shall also have the portion of tithes in the parish of Erlyngton, belonging in the past to the Dean and Chapter, called the portion of Mydelton. The Dean and Chapter, as Rectors, shall bear all charges, ordinary and extraordinary, of the Church and Vicarage, tenths and payments to the King from the Vicarage, bread, wine, etc. for service, and repairs to the Vicarage, excepted. The Vicar shall pay to the Dean and Chapter at Wylmyngton 53s. 4d. for the portion of tithes, 14d. for Pyngwellys howe and 3s. 4d. for Monkyn pynd, payments to be made half-yearly at Michaelmas and Lady Day; if any payment is in default 30 days the [f. 25 v.] Bishop may sequesterate till payment is made. Each Vicar shall, at the time of his presentation, make oath to make the payments. Sealed by the Bishop in the Manor of Aldingbourne Oct. 14, 1541. Sealed by the Dean and Chapter in token of their consent in the Chapter House, Oct. 15, 1541.
