WYCOMBE (WEST).

Abridgment of the Book of Common Prayer. London: [West-Wycombe:] 1773. 8° (bodl.)

This work, composed by, and privately printed at the expense of, Francis, Lord le Despencer, is described in Dibdin's Library Companion, 2nd ed., 1825, p. 48. The Bodleian copy was formerly the property of Sir John Dashwood-King, Bart. The compiler's design evidently was not only to reduce the services to the utmost brevity, but to omit what he calls "speculative points" of doctrine. Even the director of the impious rites of Medmenham found it convenient to have "a form of godliness." His heathenish proceedings on the enshrinement of Paul Whitehead's heart, in 1775, have been described by several writers. In 1781, shortly before his Lordship's death, Whitehead's ghost is said to have appeared to him and several members of his household. See Cowper's letter to Unwin, 24 Nov., 1781 (Southey's Cowper, Vol. IV. p. 147). Cowper doubtless received the information from Lady Austen, who was connected with the Dashwood family. The heart disappeared in 1839.

Some local works which have come to the knowledge of the compiler of this list too late for the insertion of their titles in the proper places, are necessarily reserved for an Appendix. Notices of any other publications which ought to be inserted, as well as any corrections, will be thankfully received.
