MILTON KEYNES ARCHAEOLOGY UNIT

The last and the largest of Britain's post-war new towns, the city of Milton Keynes was designated in 1967, covering an area of 82 square kilometres in north Buckinghamshire. Between 1971 and 1991, archaeological excavation and fieldwork was carried out in advance of development within the city by the Milton Keynes Archaeology Unit, which was set up and funded by Milton Keynes Development Corporation. The scale of development in the area during that time has provided an unprecedented opportunity for the study of the historic landscape of the area, and sites of all periods have been examined in detail.

The results of this work are being published through the Buckinghamshire Archaeological Society as a series of monographs on major excavations or related studies. Some smaller excavations will appear in the Society's Journal, Records of Buckinghamshire.
